It's where purpose meets poetry – and I'm truly humbled to hold this space, where every effort echoes far beyond its moment.

In the months ahead, I hope to see more of us stepping forward – whether it's participating in initiatives, contributing ideas, or simply showing up with curiosity and drive. Let's continue to build a WICASA that reflects who we are: passionate, united, and ever-evolving.

MESSAGE FROM MANAGING COMMITTEE MEMBER

Dear Friends,

I feel extremely grateful and honoured to be part of such a prestigious committee – WICASA Ahmedabad.

Reflecting on my journey with WICASA, I remember being a shy girl who always knew she loved being on stage, loved to speak, and cherished making connections – but she didn't know where to begin. That's when she discovered WICASA, a platform that gave her the opportunity to showcase her talents.

She went on to become the Master of Ceremony for a national conference, where she shared the stage with esteemed dignitaries, made lifelong friends, and found the right guidance and support that helped her clear her exams.

And here she is today – a Managing Committee Member of WICASA Ahmedabad for the term 2025-26 – determined to give back and contribute meaningfully to the growing CA student community of Ahmedabad.

As Sir Walt Disney once said:

“All of our dreams can come true if we have the courage to pursue them.”

To all my fellow students – this is true. Dreams do come true. So never stop dreaming big and believing in yourself.

With CA exams just around the corner, the WICASA committee wishes you all the very best.

Give it your best shot, stay confident – and yes, don't forget to stay hydrated!

Warm regards,
Aneri Prashant Gandhi

MARKETS ARE CRACKING—BUT NOTHING'S BROKEN. SO WHAT'S REALLY GOING ON?

"Markets crash for two reasons: when something breaks, or when something shifts."

In 2008, what broke was trust. Exotic derivatives, AAA-rated illusions, and a decade of greed detonated the global financial system in one breathtaking moment. In 2020, it wasn't Wall Street but a microbe that shut the world down—emptying cities, crashing demand, and shattering the illusion of control. But now, in 2025, there's no virus. No Lehman. No bullets flying over trade routes. And yet the market is cracking.

The S&P 500 is bleeding. The Nasdaq has crumpled into bear territory. Oil prices are slumping. IPOs are disappearing into smoke. And gold—that ancient barometer of fear—has soared past ~$3,110.

And still, no chaos. Just a slow, cold realization: this is not a meltdown. It's a message. We're not witnessing collapse. We're witnessing a correction—not of prices, but of beliefs. The catalyst? A policy earthquake. President Donald Trump, back in office and unapologetically combative, has detonated the largest wave of tariffs since the 1930s: 60% on Chinese imports, 27% on Indian goods, 45% on Vietnam, sweeping measures on Japan and Europe. In response, China has retaliated with surgical precision—34% tariffs on U.S. imports, a freeze on U.S.-bound investments, and restrictions on rare earths exports.

But this isn't just retaliation. It's repositioning. Unlike in 2018, Beijing is prepared. Xi Jinping has spent a decade fortifying China's economy against precisely this scenario—championing domestic tech, insulating supply chains, shifting to the yuan. While Wall Street bleeds, the MSCI China index is quietly rising. China is absorbing the pain today to mold tomorrow. What Trump sees as punishment, Beijing sees as prophecy.

But that resilience carries global consequences. China's overcapacity isn't disappearing—it's being redirected. Brussels is already bracing for a flood of discounted goods—EVs, solar panels, electronics—threatening to drown European industries in price wars. Macron has raised the alarm. The EU is drafting tariffs. The risk isn't just inflation anymore. It's deflation, driven not by collapse, but by overproduction disguised as competitiveness.

Ironically, the policy meant to isolate China may be catalyzing its rise. As America fractures alliances and scorches multilateralism, China is courting the Global South with infrastructure, climate diplomacy, and supply-chain seduction. The nation once accused of gaming the system may soon start setting the rules.

And what about the U.S.? The Smoot-Hawley déjà vu is hard to miss. History has seen this play before. Only this time, it's amplified—by social media, polarized politics, and an electorate sold on victimhood.

Trump calls it fairness. But trade deficits aren't theft. They're a macroeconomic mirror: Americans spend more than they save. Tariffs don't fix that. They just shift the cost. Consumers pay more. Businesses shrink margins. And central banks brace for the blow.

Already, the signs are flashing. One-year inflation swaps have spiked to 3.5%, the highest since 2022. And the Fed? Trapped. Powell faces a brutal trade-off: cut rates to cushion growth and risk feeding inflation, or hold rates and choke a slowing economy. Either way, it's a policy paradox. JPMorgan sees deeper short-term pain than expected. The real fear? That inflation expectations become unanchored. Because once the belief in price stability breaks, it's not just demand that collapses. It's confidence.

Europe, ASEAN, CPTPP nations—they all face a similar choice. Fight back? Or move forward? The smarter play may be rerouting trade, building regional fortresses, and designing rules that don't rely on Washington's mood swings.

And then there's India. Caught in the crossfire. But not paralyzed. With over $118 billion in exports to the U.S., India can't afford to escalate. But it also won't kneel. Jewellery exports are slowing in Surat. Pharma firms are watching the horizon. Auto component orders are thinning. And yet, there's no panic yet.

Instead: policy choreography. Digital taxes were withdrawn for U.S. tech giants. Starlink was welcomed. Energy deals expanded. Delhi isn't retaliating. It's recalibrating.

India's tariff exposure is only 3% of GDP. But psychology matters more than math. And the psychology today is clear: play the long game. Commerce ministry officials are working toward a trade deal by August. And exporters? They're already moving to fill the vacuum left by tariff-hit rivals.

The RBI, too, is steady at the wheel. Selling dollars to protect the rupee. Injecting liquidity into bond markets. Holding inflation at bay. This isn't stimulus. It's stability.

All of this points to a larger truth. This isn't just about trade. It's about the end of predictability. For three decades, globalization was a gospel of efficiency. Lowest cost. Fastest route. Borderless ambition. But that era is over. Today, the winners are those who hedge risk, decentralize power, and build resilience into every link of their chain.

Markets don't fear bad news. They fear confusion. And right now, the most dangerous export from America isn't a tariff. It's uncertainty.

This isn't a crash. It's a controlled demolition—of belief.

And in the silence that follows, it won't be those shouting loudest who shape the new order. It'll be those who listened hardest. Moved fastest. And built quietly.

Not through confrontation.

But through coherence.

HOW INDIA IS FALLING INTO THE LOOP OF SOCIAL CONFORMITY THE TRAP OF ECONOMIC STRUGGLES, NUTRITIONAL DISPARITIES, AND MATERIALISM

India, the world's largest democracy and one of the fastest-growing economies, is facing an ironic paradox today. Despite significant advancements in technology, globalization, and development, India is increasingly trapped in a cycle of social conformity. This cycle is driven by external pressures and norms rather than personal needs and desires, restricting individual freedoms and exacerbates systemic issues that impede the nation's development.

Social conformity refers to individuals changing their behaviors, beliefs, or attitudes to it in with group norms or societal expectations. In India, this phenomenon has deep cultural roots, with traditional family structures, societal pressures, and a collective mindset shaping individual choices. In modern India, these pressures have evolved, fueled by the influence of social media, globalization, and consumer culture. As a result, social conformity has taken on new forms, where individuals feel compelled not only to adhere to traditional norms but also to emulate the lifestyles of the affluent and successful.

Economic Struggles and the Middle-Class Dilemma

India's rapid economic growth has led to rising incomes, especially in urban areas, and significant foreign investment. However, this economic prosperity has not been evenly distributed, with the richest 10% earning more than half of the national income, while the bottom 50% earns only 13%. This inequality creates an environment where upward mobility is a challenge for the majority. The middle class, often regarded as the backbone of the economy, faces a constant tension between aspirations and economic reality. The desire for financial stability and upward mobility is central to the middle-class mindset, often influenced by media portrayals of success. However, many individuals struggle to reconcile their aspirations with their financial limitations.

The pressure to conform to the successful lifestyle often leads to unsustainable borrowing and consumer debt. For instance, many people in urban areas are increasingly taking loans for luxury items such as smartphones, cars, and expensive weddings, despite not having the financial means to support such purchases. This borrowing, often fueled by the desire to project an image of success, places families in precarious financial situations. The emphasis on external appearances often diverts attention from more meaningful investments.

Nutritional Disparities: When Food Becomes a Luxury

A significant yet often overlooked consequence of social conformity in India is the growing nutritional divide. Despite progress in reducing hunger and malnutrition, millions still suffer from undernourishment, and access to healthy food remains a luxury. The drive to mimic affluent lifestyles often takes precedence over the need for proper nutrition, especially for those who can't afford it. The National Family Health Survey (NFHS) reveals that over 35% of Indian children under five suffer from malnutrition, and there are significant socio-economic and regional disparities in access to nutritious food. The dietary shift, influenced by Westernized lifestyles and the desire to appear modern and affluent, contributes to rising health issues such as obesity, diabetes, and hypertension among the urban middle class.

As urbanization progresses, nutritional inequality has become more pronounced. While the affluent can afford organic foods, supplements, and super foods, the poor often struggle to access even basic vegetables and proteins. In such a system, achieving the ideal of health and vitality promoted by social norms is a distant dream for many.

The iPhone Trap: Materialism and the Pressure to Conform

One of the most visible symbols of social conformity in India is the obsession with high- end consumer electronics, especially smartphones. The iPhone, in particular, has become a status symbol in Indian society. Owning an iPhone is no longer just about functionality but about signaling wealth and success. The iPhone, along with other luxury items, serves as a powerful tool of social conformity, pushing individuals to spend beyond their means to fit into the perceived “elite” group.

The culture surrounding status symbols in India, particularly Apple’s products, is carefully curated. Despite their high cost (with prices for the latest models often exceeding ₹100,000), iPhones remain a coveted luxury, especially among the youth. Social media platforms like Instagram and Facebook amplify this desire, as people post images showcasing their affluent lifestyles and luxury purchases, creating a cycle where the pressure to conform intensifies. The emotional toll of constantly comparing oneself to others is another hidden cost of materialism. Social media amplifies this comparison, as people are bombarded with images of the “perfect” lifestyle, complete with expensive gadgets and designer clothes. This materialistic mindset detracts from more meaningful pursuits, such as personal growth and long-term financial stability. Ultimately, it creates a cycle of dissatisfaction as people chase unattainable ideals of wealth and status.

Moving Toward a More Authentic Society

Moving towards a more authentic society is essential to break free from the loop of conformity and build a society that values authenticity, individuality, and sustainability. By promoting financial literacy, nutritional awareness, and critical thinking, individuals can make decisions that prioritize long-term well-being over short-term appearances. Furthermore, fostering a culture of self-expression, sustainability, and responsible consumer behavior can mitigate the harmful effects of social conformity.
